How France's 1989 School Headscarf Dispute Became National

Original reporting by Swati Goel Sharma

Three students' headscarves at a French school in 1989 triggered suspensions, a compromise and a national argument over secular education. This historical account follows the dispute into later legislation, showing how a classroom accommodation became a prolonged contest over religious symbols in public schools.

THE ESSENTIAL POINTS

- In September 1989, three Muslim students began attending their junior high school in headscarves, saying their faith required the clothing.
- A negotiated compromise permitted headscarves around the school campus but excluded classrooms, allowing the girls to return after their initial suspension.
- The girls subsequently wore headscarves inside classrooms despite the compromise, and the principal suspended them again as similar disputes appeared elsewhere.
- The 2004 restrictions extended beyond Islamic headscarves to Jewish skullcaps and oversized Christian crosses, without naming those symbols in the legislation.

THE TAKEAWAY

The 1989 dispute over three pupils' headscarves became a national debate, and in 2004 France passed a law restricting religious symbols in public schools.
